CHECKMATE » LAWRENCE STRIEGEL

After her induction into the U.S. Chess Hall of Fame last year, Lisa Lane reminisced about her life as a chess star six decades ago.

"It seems to me like it belongs to some other person," she said during a phone call with this columnist.

That interview was among her last. Lane died Feb. 28 at her home in Carmel, New York, at age 90.

Lane's chess prominence was meteoric. She won the U.S. Women's Championship in 1959 and 1966 (tied) and represented the United States in international tournaments. In 1961, she became the first chess figure on the cover of Sports Illustrated -- a distinction she partly attributed to her looks as an attractive brunette.

In 1967, she quit chess, in part because she couldn't make a living at the game -- women earned too little. For example, the 1966 U.S. women's championship awarded the winner $600; the men's prize was $6,000.

At a protest Lane organized outside the women's event in Manhattan, one demonstrator's sign said, "One Man Is Worth Ten Women!"

Lane v Borisenko

Below, Lisa Lane beats Valentina Borisenko, a five-time winner of the Soviet women's championship, at the 1964 women's Candidates Tournament at Sukhumi, a city on the eastern Black Sea.

11. f4	Qc7	25. Kf2	Ne6

Lane said Forry Laucks, a chess organizer, composed a protest song. Lane cheerfully sang it on the phone:

"I'm gonna lay down my queen and pawn, until the queen that fights gets paid like kings and knights. 'Cause queens got appetites!"

Although there is pay equity in a few pro sports, women still earn half as much as men at the top levels of chess. "It'll get there someday," Lane said with some skepticism. "The world will end someday, too."
