Phoenix Suns owner Mat Ishbia says the outlook for his team is better than many people realize. "The house is not on fire," he says. "We're in a great position. It's not hard to fix."

Is the Phoenix Suns' house burning or are they closer than it looks?

By DOUG HALLER
The Athletic

Phoenix » Mat Ishbia talks so fast it's hard to keep up. The Phoenix Suns owner is like this on the radio or on podcasts. He's like this on stage during corporate seminars or on video calls with small groups. He is a force of positivity, making everything out of reach feel closer than it actually is. And this is exactly how Ishbia came off Wednesday during a media session about the stunning end to Phoenix's basketball season.

Ishbia didn't have anything to announce; nor did he discuss the job status of head coach Frank Vogel. He mainly wanted to discuss his irritation with certain narratives that have formed since the Minnesota Timberwolves finished off a four-game sweep of the Suns. Mainly, reports that the "house is burning" in downtown Phoenix. That the Suns have missed their chance.

"Incorrect," Ishbia said. "The Phoenix Suns are doing great."

The billionaire mortgage executive said he understands the fanbase's frustration — he's the one who set the championship expectations, after all — but he wanted to make sure they understood the bigger picture. Despite the quick postseason exit, Ishbia said the Suns are close — "inches," in fact — from where they want to be.

"Ask the other 29 GMs — 26 of them would trade their whole team for our whole team and our draft picks and everything as is," Ishbia said. "The house is not on fire. We're in a great position. It's not hard to fix."

(As soon as Ishbia said this, it seemed like everyone in the Footprint Center media room was counting on their fingers the teams that definitely would not make this trade. Boston, Denver and Oklahoma City, for sure. Minnesota, definitely. Dallas, maybe.)

Ishbia talked to reporters for nearly 30 minutes about the state of the Suns. General manager James Jones did so for 15. Three themes emerged.

The biggest takeaway: Both Ishbia and Jones do not see major cracks in the roster's foundation. Even though the Suns had to rally to avoid the Play-In Tournament, they believe in Devin Booker, Kevin Durant and Bradley Beal as a championship core. And they believe they have solid pieces surrounding them in big man Jusuf Nurkic and guard Grayson Allen.

"We have our starting five signed for multiple years together," Ishbia said.

Before the season, Ishbia said the front office wondered if Phoenix's starting five would play 60-65 games together. Beal's back injury, suffered before the season, torpedoed that goal. The "Big 3" played in only 41 games together, so team chemistry was like road construction, taking longer than everyone thought it should. Booker and Durant were top-10 NBA scorers, but it often seemed like they played independently of each other instead of off each other. One took over for a stretch, then the other.

Traded to Phoenix in June, Beal fit in the best he could, taking over lead-guard duties late in the season and guarding the opponent's best perimeter scorer. His sacrifice was a top storyline and perhaps the chief reason Phoenix avoided the Play-In Tournament, but few will remember it because Beal was so awful in the Game 4 elimination loss to Minnesota. He said Monday that it was like he could do nothing right.

A pure point guard will be discussed, but that doesn't mean one will be pursued. Jones said it would come down to fit (and price). "And when you put that player on the floor and you take the ball out of someone's hands, whose hands are you taking it out of and who are you putting in that position?" Jones said. He doesn't deny a pure point guard would help the Suns, he just doesn't see it as their biggest problem.

Complications exist. Phoenix's projected payroll
